Questions 31~34

A snake with its head cut off isn't necessarily a harmless snake, say experts.

According to a report by two Arizona doctors, fifteen percent of the patients they have treated for snakebite were bitten by snakes which they thought were dead. "Freshly killed snakes may still bite," explained Charles Crutchfield, a physician at Phoenix Medical Center. "Even chopping off the head of a poisonous snake may not make it harmless."

In their report in the New England Journal of Medicine, Crutchfield and his colleague document several cases of snakebite by "dead" snakes. For instance, one man was bitten by a snake which

Questions 35~38

"What happened here?" the officer asked the woman. A few meters away was a small car with a crushed front end. On the other side of the street, a dented taxi was blocking the sidewalk.

"It all happened so fast," replied the woman, "I was just walking to the store when heard the sound of screeching tires, looked up and saw the taxi hit the red car there in the middle of road. Then the taxi swerved off the road and onto the sidewalk."

The police officer thanked the woman for her time and took down her name and number. He told her that she would only be contacted if anyone had any questions about her information.

Sorting out responsibility for the accident wouldn't be easy. The driver of the red car said she'd been trying to make a left turn when the taxi just seemed to come out of nowhere. The taxi driver was demanding that the light didn't turn yellow until after he entered the intersection and that the driver of the red car wasn't watching where she was going. The police officer had an idea that lawyers would need to be involved before this was all over.

35. The woman is talking to the police officer because
A. she was driving the taxi.
B. she was driving the red car.
C. she saw the accident while she was walking.
D. she was a passenger in the taxi.
36. The small, red car
