While visiting the National Museum of Prehistory earlier this month with his family, a man surnamed Wu asked the museum staff if it was possible to retrieve a wishing card from last year so that he could use it in a last effort to win back his ex-girlfriend.

Even though there were at least 8,000 wishing cards tacked to the wall outside the museum, the museum's public service division staffer Lee Hung-ni stepped up to the challenge after hearing about Wu's plight.

Wu, currently a graduate school student, said he visited the museum on Aug. 31 last year with his then-girlfriend and the two left a wishing card on the wall.

Wu said he had written his girlfriend's wishes on the card before letting her put her thumbprint on it.

Of the four different types of cards provided by the museum, Wu had chosen one with a picture of the rainbow, on which he had written: "Hoping that whitebait will not walk all over the white shark."

The "whitebait" on the card referred to Wu's girlfriend, while the white shark referred to Wu himself, he said.
